Not illustrated. 1852 Excerpt: . . . should I make the remark now, were it not that Lord Campbell has upheld the former judgment without even a superficial review of the evidence, though the many acknowledgments which I have received, not only from friends but strangers, of the conviction of innocence which these pages have produced, prove that to absolve Mr. Barber from reproach it is only necessary to understand his case. God forbid that I should draw from this omission any inference to the derogation of judicial impartiality. I repudiate such an unworthy idea; but it is not indecorous to remark that the very impossibility of thus accounting for the omission, proves that the evidence, and therefore the real merits of the case, have never yet been understood by the Court. Are my arguments sustained by the facts Even the bitterest of Mr. Barbers opponents has never disputed my statement of the facts. Are my arguments forcible and prima Jade conclusive It would not become me to quote other evidence that they are so considered, than the demand for a third edition upon a subject of merely personal interest. It would be absurd to suppose that the same reasoning could possibly have escaped the judicial mind, had even half the same attention been bestowed on the case. And in such a case, so peculiar in its character, so novel in its form, and so important not only to the individual but to the profession, it would be equally absurd to suppose that...
