Chamber of Commerce, it is best to pursue the plan adopted in other parts of this report, of inquiring what are its weak points as it stands at present and how far the Council's action can strengthen them. (1.) Though examinations and syllabuses may stimulate and test teaching they cannot by themselves stand in lieu of it. Probably, considering the means at its disposal, the London Chamber of Commerce has acted in the only manner open to it in starting from the examination end. But the most crying evil is the want of teachers competent to give higher commercial instruction, and until we have them the results of a mere examination scheme will be somewhat disappointing. The Council would, therefore, do well to supplement the action of the Chamber of Commerce by supplying the teaching, whether by training teachers at home or on the Continent, or by aiding the proposed higher commercial school, or by enabling one or more of our higher colleges to give higher instruction in commercial subjects, or by all of these methods. (2.) One of the greatest evils of the present unorganised and chaotic state of our secondary education is the multiplicity of examinations on which the schoolmasters have to keep their eye. The tables on p. 171 bring this out very clearly. First there are the examinations which profess to test the whole work of the school or, at least, of certain classes or individual boys, such as those...
