Not illustrated. 1912 Excerpt: .a man cultivates to save moisture the more rapidly he depletes his soil, providing he does not take proper precautions in keeping it fertile. Thorough cultivation is essential to the highest corn yields on any soil, rich or poor, but where a man will fall-plow deep or disc land so as to make it most absorptive and retentive of moisture before plowing he can to a certain extent avoid excessive cultivation. It is only through a combination of all the factors tending to increase the yield of corn, however, that a man will secure the highest net profits. Thus far our farmers have depended too much upon their skill as cultivators. They have depended almost entirely upon the native fertility of the soil. The farmer who is to make the most money as a corn grower during the next quarter century will be the man who...
