Excerpt from Rfd Letter to Radio Farm Directors From Radio and Television Service: June 1958 In the meantime, you are probably mulling over some of the revelations made at the 51st annual meeting of the American Society of Agricultural Engineers held at the university of California, the first half of this week. Maybe you noticed the report of the committee headed by our farm.structures researcher, Wallace Ashby. That committee summarized replies from ag. Engineers all over the country on farm building trends. They indicated that since it is impractical to replace all obsolete buildings in the near future, special attention is needed to adapting existing buildings for the transition from.diversified operations to larger, more specialized farming. Many livestock buildings do not meet new needs which lean toward more confinement and drylot feeding. Changes in feed-crop hand ling methods were also indicated as a well-marked trend that affects building design. Many replies stressed the need for better communication between research workers in government and industry, and farmers, builders, and dealers maybe that s where TV comes one of our research engineers, V. S. Aronovici...
